What we do.

We are a source of information or we know how you can get it

At UNBC every graduate student is valued as individual both personally and with respect to the composition of their graduate program. This individuality of program creates a level of complexity that requires organization.

The Office of Graduate Programs serves as a central location and source of information for all graduate students and graduate faculty at UNBC. It exists to help faculty and graduate students succeed in their programs of study, research and creative endeavors. Everyone in the Office of Graduate Programs is committed to helping you to make the most of your graduate education.

Some of the roles and remit of the Office of Graduate Programs are:

- to assist with and develop graduate program policies;
- to support new program development;
- to promote and facilitate graduate student scholarship applications, and to provide guidance and support to graduate students in their programs;
- to ensure a transparent, consistent and equitable administration of graduate programs and awards;
- to ensure the evaluation and quality assurance of graduate programs;
- to advocate for graduate student needs within the larger academic community;
- to assist with individual student and problems;
- and to ensure the provision of outstanding opportunities for the growth and training of graduate students and professional development of faculty in their role as supervisors.
