Decolonial Feminist Worldmaking in the Age of Fascism

Progressive political and social justice movements are under attack in many countries, with the rise of right-wing power politics. From Aotearoa to India and the Netherlands, political movements that tout antifeminist and anti-human rights discourses are gaining momentum. In the western world, discourses such as 'feminist foreign policy' often water down to soft power strategies with little substance when it comes to their 'feminist core'. In feminist movements, power structures and exploitative dynamics that disregard and usurp the labor of indigenous women, for example, are rampant. In such volatile circumstances, how can we envision well and truly decolonial feminist politics, advocacy and activist praxes, organizing, knowledge-making and worldmaking? This talk is an invitation for collaborative critical reflection around this question.
